Resource 6 for Question 2

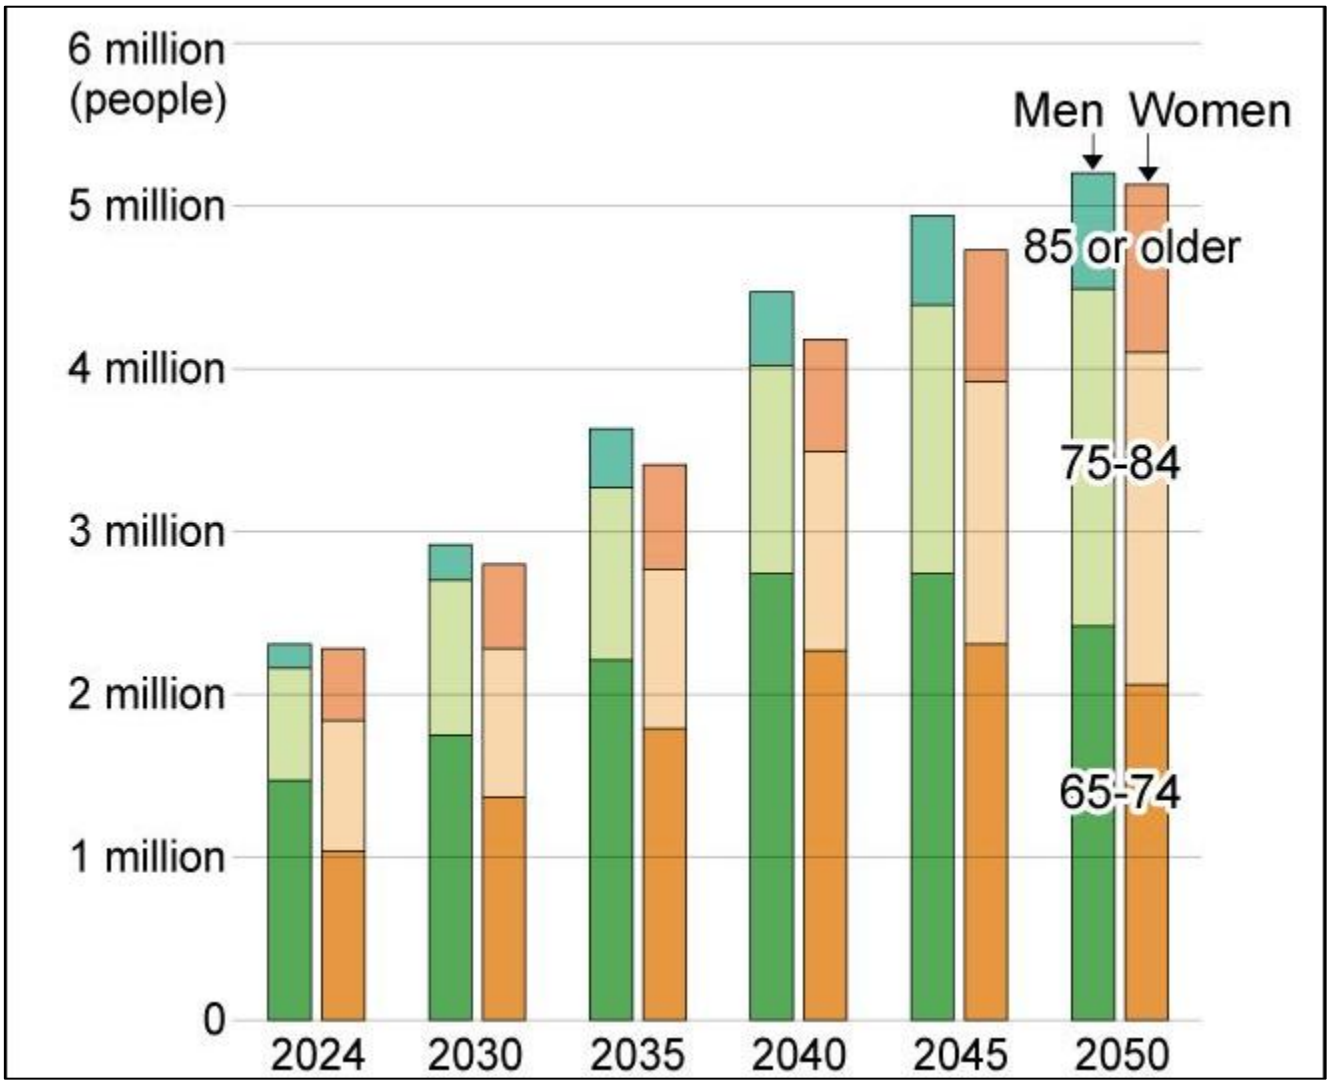

News article on the proposed redevelopment of Gillman Barracks and Maju Forest

Plans have been proposed to redevelop parts of Gillman Barracks and Maju Forest to provide new housing in Singapore. Gillman Barracks is a 40-hectare former military site currently occupied mainly by arts, lifestyle and food establishments. The new estate would contain both public and private housing, with about one-fifth of the site set aside for green spaces. At Maju Forest, approximately two-thirds of the 23-hectare forest is planned for public housing development.

The proposals demonstrate the difficulty of balancing housing needs against environmental and social concerns in a land-scarce city. Developing the sites could increase the housing supply and make more intensive use of urban land. However, residents are concerned that forest clearance could reduce biodiversity, weaken ecological connectivity and remove vegetation that cools nearby neighborhoods. The forests also provide recreational and educational spaces and are valued by residents for their contribution to physical and mental well-being. Redevelopment at Gillman Barracks may additionally affect the site's cultural heritage and existing creative businesses.
